Free Size: 776 MB Download time: 4 minute(s)Q: Javascript variable scope not working as expected why does this not work var a, b; function bar(data) { a = "Hey, I'm bar"; b = "In bar: " + data; } bar("some data"); console.log(a, b); // undefined, undefined but if i do var foo; function bar(data) { var foo = "Hey, I'm bar"; b = "In bar: " + data; } bar("some data"); console.log(a, b); // Hey, I'm bar, In bar: some data As far as I understand, the var a should be local (and thus should not appear on the console, right?) but it's not. Why's that? A: When using var, a variable will be declared locally, outside of any functions. If you declare the variable outside of any functions, both of your examples will be equivalent. In the first example, a is declared and initialized to "Hey, I'm bar", and then b is declared and initialized to "In bar: some data". Therefore, a is declared and initialized, and then b is declared and initialized. In the second example, the variable is declared and initialized outside of any functions. Therefore, it is declared and initialized. North American Paragliding Association The North American Paragliding Association (NAPA), is the major governing body for paragliding in North America.
